NateOsman I've been working on a new product and today I finally finished it (I started it in May 2017 but never announced it here). The business has now raised $7.5M and is on track to make our largest investment. Related Articles Computing the other side of the Linux bridge -- the 'other' side of a containerized, virtualized network -- can be difficult. In today's article, we'll walk through how to get your containers and virtual machines talking and share what we've learned along the way. If you don't already have Container Networking in Google Kubernetes Engine (CNI) enabled, you'll need to start by setting up something like Kubernetes to continue with our walkthrough. Starting point In our case, we'll be using Google Kubernetes Engine (GKE) and four Google Compute Engine (GCE) virtual machines to showcase a single Linux bridge and, the container ports that are mapped to that bridge. To get started, you'll need to create two virtual machines on GCE. The first is your CNI provider. In this case, we'll use Heptio Contrail. The second is a CNI provider on its own. It will be used to represent the various containers. In this article, we'll be using CRI-O to represent the containers. Right now, all our containers are running in a single namespace, but they are being deployed into separate pods (kinds of containers). The CNI provider for Contrail will tell the Contrail VM what interface to use to talk to the CRI-O provider to get to the containers in the corresponding pods. One of the biggest questions for anyone getting into this is how to tell what bridge you need to use. Unfortunately, this is not something we can configure. The virtual machines also have a static IP address for the interface they're using. So, unless you plan to change your IP address for the CNI provider, you'll need to ensure you 3e33713323
